

Paris: Modern Art

20 -23rd November 2009

From the beginning of the modern movement in art, in the mid-nineteenth century, Paris has occupied a special place. From around 1850, through the rest of the century and on into the early years of the twentieth century, Paris was the unchallenged capital of modern art, eventually acting as a magnet for artists from elsewhere who wanted to experience the cutting edge of the avant-garde. The Spaniard Picasso is only the best-known. Others included the Romanian Brancusi, the Dutchman Mondrian, and before them, Americans such as Whistler, Eakins and Mary Cassatt, not to mention the most adventurous British artists. Almost all the key movements of early modern art originated in Paris: Impressionism, Post-Impressionism, Symbolism, the Nabis, the Fauves, and above all Cubism. Subsequently, other centres emerged, notably Munich, Berlin and Moscow.

But in the 1920s political events conspired to crush the avant-garde in Germany and Russia, and reinforced the position of Paris at the forefront of the international modern movement. Even after the Second World War, when Paris was for a time eclipsed on the international scene by New York, French cultural ambition sought to redress the balance. The outcome of this was the creation of some of the most important museums in the world. As well as the expansion of the traditional Louvre, several major museums were devoted to the art of the avant-garde. Principal among these are the Musée d'Orsay, devoted to the nineteenth century, and the Pompidou Centre, or Beaubourg, devoted to the modernism, as well as the 'postmodernism', of the twentieth.
